AIMS AND OBJECTS.

BY GASKELL.

Rejoice, for no! Let all the ends thou aimst at be thy country's, Thy God's, and truth's.

—SHAKESPEARE.

There is no end to our studies of human life. Though thousands of years have passed away since the morning stars sang together and man was placed upon the earth, yet the study of existence still is fresh and interesting, and is still developing new facts and principles, or presenting old ones, under new guises. One generation has succeeded another, flourished for a day as it were, and then has passed away to make room for fresh arrivals. Their part played upon the worldly stage they have gone, where? the lingering echoes of past fame alone telling us they have lived and suffered and passed away. Love and hate, friendship and enmity have each in turn arrayed their power to sway poor human nature—love of fame, wild ambition unsparring in its selfishness—noble emulation, true, strong and self-forgetful, desirous of competing in usefulness with all—each in turn passes before our mental vision in chronicle of old, adding to the ever increasing aggregate of human experience and wisdom.

The noblest triumphs and the most miserable failures jostle and crowd each other on the way of life, constituting a sort of kaleidoscopic patchwork of light and shade, changeable, unreal and uncertain, readable in meaning only by the earnest eye of faith—faith in an omnipotent, omniscient and love inspiring God of justice and mercy.

An aim or object is needed in life to arrest and chain the attention, and consistency and perseverance are necessary, if a straightforward consistent course is followed and dispatch in the accomplishment of a purpose is desired. If there is no guiding aim, no object of pursuit, no purpose to carry out, no defined pathway to follow, we will be apt to swerve from our course one side or the other, as interest or desire prompt us and as likely to miss entirely the goal sought as to win it. The plowman who desires to turn a straight furrow, sets his gaze upon an object on the farther side of the field; he plows and no matter what his skill in the absence of such an object, he is liable to follow a crooked course. And in setting that aim we should be sure that it is not a movable one, or we may fare as did the unfortunate Irishman, who was told by his master to take for his object point a grazing horse upon the opposite side of the field and plow directly towards. The master being called away did not watch Pat's proceedings and when he returned at the end of a quarter of an hour's absence, he saw Pat still plowing towards the horse which had left his former position and walked to the opposite side of the field, and the furrow Pat had turned, had followed the sinuous course of the moving horse and was about as crooked as a corkscrew, or a Chinese puzzle. So it seems the movable aim of many people. It is not stationary and changes at different periods of their lives, there being no certainty of the same views being continuous for two days together. It is not every one who understands what he does want, or he allows the ever recurring incidents of daily life to carry him away from it and the indefiniteness of his desires leads him at times to the extremes of foolishness. There are very few individuals who escape altogether a departure from a right path, only frequency and extent creating a difference in degree.

A young man, or a young woman has an object of pursuit and an aim of some kind. What is it? Is it to gain wisdom and knowledge and to follow worthily in the footsteps of the virtuous dead or the noble living—for many noble men and women are living now—or is it to gratify some trifling want or foolish vanity, that we may show our superior abilities and graces? Is it to become a good man, or a good woman, a useful citizen doing our part in the work of life, easing the burden of the sin-laden, weary and suffering poor on the way of life, cheering the unfortunate, giving encouragement to the despondent and cast down? or, is it to listlessly pass our time in indolence, fostering every selfish feeling to the exclusion of all useful and honest labor—in apathy or worse still, to waste our energies in pursuing objects of vanity and sin.

No young man should seek to enter upon the arena and undertake the duties of life, without having an aim of some kind; nor should older ones persevere in their labors without a definite purpose. The more pure and noble this aim is, the purer and nobler will be the life lived. No one can set his aim too high, as regards purity and usefulness. We are all children of one common parent and in no way can we better display our regard to God, than in living useful and kind to one another. While every one should think with the Englishman—that his house is his castle, yet, like the generous pioneer of our western borders, the intruder should always hang out. Innocence should ever be shielded from contact with sin, where possible, and weakness should always be protected from the tyranny of power. While it is desirable that wickedness be recognized and avoided, yet it should never be sought out in its secret haunts, in the vaulting spirit of a desire to meet and vanquish it; and it is in just such moments of self-glorification and over-confidence, that men are really most weak, because off their guard. Let us pray rather than temptation be kept from us, than for power to resist, as such a course is far the safest, for no man really knows what he may do under certain circumstances, nor may he go through a similar trial a second time entirely unsoiled and unharmed.

Hostetter's Bitters meets the requirements of the rational medical philosophy which at present prevails. It is a perfectly pure vegetable remedy, embracing the three important properties of a preventive, a tonic and an alterative. It fortifies the body against disease, invigorates and revitalizes the torpid stomach and liver, and effects a salutary change in the entire system. For sale by all Druggists and Dealers generally.
